Doppler blueshift is caused by movement of a source towards the observer. The term applies to any decrease in wavelength and increase in frequency caused by relative motion, even outside the visible spectrum. Only objects moving at near-relativistic speeds toward the observer are noticeably bluer to the naked eye, but the wavelength of any reflected or emitted photon or other particle is ...

Blueshift is not something that can be seen with the eye. It is a property of how light is affected by an object's motion. Astronomers determine blueshift by measuring tiny shifts in the wavelengths of light from the object. They do this with an instrument that splits the light into its component wavelengths.
